13 BREEZE BLOCKS

Who wants solid patio walls? These 1960s-style beauties provide separation, air flow and light all at the same time, while the geometric patterns ooze mid-century glamour. They also tune into our love of concrete and texture. “The resurgence of the breeze block is more than a nostalgic yearning for the golden years of Modernism,” says Brett Ward, general manager of international marketing for Brickworks. “Breeze blocks offer incredible architectural drama and reflect a new appreciation of the design potential of the humble concrete block.”

14 MILLENNIAL PINK

After turn-of-the-century minimalist greys and charcoals – with kapow punches of red – we craved softness and romance. Warm pastel pink came to the rescue, teamed with sandy hues as muted counterpoints. It's celebrated in furniture, accessories, rugs and tiles. Designer Greg Natale recently revealed a whole house celebrating the hue. “Pastel pink lets me show my softer side,” he says. “When I was a teenager in the 1980s, pink and grey was hot. That gorgeous combination made me yearn to become an interior designer.”
